

Information #3 submitted by Judy Daugherty

New research shows that wind turbines actually can attract lightning due to the static charge they put out. When you read in the Vestas safety manual that they call for a 1300 ft area to be cordoned off just for fire; how could you possibly site a turbine within that area? The public needs to be better informed of the real dangers just like this article addresses.

Lightning bolts love wind turbines a little too much | Ars Technica